If they should agree to this, would not their places be filled with non-union men, just as fast as they could be found, until the union was entirely displaced? Of course, it is necessary that union laborers have a preference for members of their organization, but to make it a part of their purpose of organization to prevent the employment of non-union men by refusing to work with them, wherever the union is strong enough, is coercion. It is exactly like the black-list of employers. On the other hand, it is true that this practice has been brought into existence by the unfair attitude of the employers towards union men. It is not an uncommon occurrence--I have known many such myself--that, for the purpose of ruining and ultimately breaking the union, employers...
