Of a dull moon made indistinct our fight; He foremost fell!--but see, the woman creeps Like a lost thing, that wanders as she sleeps. See, here her husbands body--but she knows That other dead, and that her action shows. Rachel! why look you at your mortal foe--She does not hear us--Whither will she go Now, more attentive, on the dead they gazed, And they were brothers: sorrowing and amazed, On all a momentary silence came, A common softness, and a moral shame. Seized you the poachers said my lord. -- They fled, And we pursued not--one of them was dead, And one of us: they turned through the wood, Two lives were gone, and we no more pursued. Two lives of men, of valiant brothers, lost! Enough, my lord, do hares and pheasants cost! As men with children at their sport behold, And smile to see them, though unmoved and cold, Smile at the recollected games, and then Depart and mix in the affairs of men: So Rachel looks upon the world, and sees. It cannot longer pain her, cannot please, . . . But just detain the passing thought, or cause A gentle smile of pity or applause; . . . And then the recollected soul repairs Her slumbering hope, and heeds her own affairs. (From Tales of the Hall. Bk. xxi.)
