Excerpt: . . . 7 Project Team Activity Microgravity Teamwork Grades 3-12 Teacher Information It is never too soon to get students to work in cooperative teams or to develop career awareness. The technology design briefs in this guide suggest that students should be placed in teams whenever possible and assigned a career role. At the elementary level, students may need help understanding their role in a team. Also, they may need extra time to work out solutions to problems. At times, you may decide to be the principal investigator in order to get the activity started more efficiently. At the middle and high school levels, students All space missions are the result of teamwork, starting with willbenefit from initial guidance concerning small groups like the one working out procedures for glovebox experiments (above) to large teams like the mission teamworkand increasing responsibility for managers directing the ASTRO-2 Spacelab mission (below). carryingout their career roles. The careers used in the following activity simulate NASA project teams. Introduction Many professional projects require people to work together effectively in teams. The success of the design and engineering activities students will do in each microgravity unit depends on teamwork. To have a good team, every member needs to do his or her assigned tasks well and on time. Students will work as a project team member in each of the activities in this guide. Students will set up...
