Dept. of Housing and Urban Development, Office of Policy Development and Research, 2006 OCLC Number: (OCoLC)191913159 Subject: House construction -- Technological innovations. Excerpt: . . . differentiation, and profits) and business fragmentation. Fragmentation includes several dimensions: geography (manifesting in different regulations and codes and or information sharing), horizontal organization (resulting in possible problems in communications between builders and in turnover rates), and vertical organization (from independence rather than interdependence within the process, information sharing, and the protection of intellectual property associated with a new product). In addition, they pointed out that homebuilding is a complex process that includes multiple participants with different but often interrelated motives that impact innovation. The broad categories that Koebel et al. (2003) identified as possible determinants of adoption and diffusion serve as a useful organization of the literature pertinent to residential production builders. The categories are Organizational Structure, Organizational Culture and Decision Process, Human Resources, Market Context, Industry Characteristics (including communication channels and social networks, particularly between suppliers and venders), Technical Attributes...
